Established in 1971, City University of New York Baccalaureate for Unique and Interdisciplinary Studies is an individualized degree program intended for highly motivated, academically strong students who have well-formulated academic and career goals and the vision and drive to design with faculty mentors their own areas of concentration. The program is for students who want an area of concentration not available as a major at any of the four-year CUNY colleges.

Most students are working adults, and many are raising families: Eighty percent are over twenty-five years old (forty-nine percent are over thirty-five years old); and a significant number are returning to school, often after a hiatus of from five to thirty years. The program has an annual enrollment of approximately seven hundred students and over six thousand alumni.

Students must matriculate at a CUNY college (their "home college"), but are encouraged to take courses throughout the CUNY system and to pursue independent research, field-work, study abroad, and other academic opportunities.

For additional information, see the Program's web site or contact the admissions office, as indicated above.

CUNY SCHOOL OF PROFESSIONAL STUDIES

Nurture New York's Nature, Inc., CUNY's Creative Arts Team, and CUNY's John F. Kennedy, Jr. Institute for Worker Education), SPS offers graduate and undergraduate certificate and degree programs in a wide range of fields, including CUNY's first online Master's and online Baccalaureate programs.

SPS is home to the Joseph S. Murphy Institute for Worker Education and Labor Studies and the Off-Campus College. The former offers educational opportunities to union members to meet their career advancement and personal growth needs. It also serves as an academic resource on issues of concern to the labor movement and publishes New Labor Forum, a national journal of analysis and debate. The latter offers working students access to a college education by providing workplace related, credit-bearing courses, and certificates.

In addition to the wide array of academic and professional programs, the School of Professional Studies partners with organizations to help them develop and deliver customized educational programs to improve the skills of their workforce and the quality of their services.

The CUNY Graduate School of Journalism offers a Master of Arts degree in Journalism. It is a full-time, three-semester curriculum with a summer internship program between the second and third semesters. The School is located at 219 West 40th Street, next door to the headquarters of The New York Times and a fifteen-minute walk from the Graduate Center.

The School offers three media tracks: Print (newspapers and magazines); broadcast (radio and TV); or digital new media (interactive, multimedia journalism). Because these media formats are converging, all students will also be trained to produce stories for different media platforms. Students choose one of five subject specialties: urban reporting, business/economics reporting, arts/culture reporting, health/medicine reporting, or international reporting.

For additional information, see the School's Web site or contact Dean Stephen B. Shepard, as indicated above.

Founded in 2001, Macaulay Honors College is a flagship program that exemplifies educational excellence and university-wide collaboration. From its landmark building at West 67th Street in Manhattan, Macaulay Honors College works in partnership with the seven senior colleges of CUNY. Some 1,400 high-achieving students, most of whom are immigrants or children of immigrants, select from 210 majors at their home colleges. The program for Macaulay University Scholars emphasizes undergraduate research, global learning, graduate and professional mentoring, and community engagement. Special benefits include free tuition and access to an Opportunities Fund that supports individual academic aspirations such as research projects and study abroad. The interdisciplinary Macaulay core curriculum explores the culture, science, people, and future of New York.
